After WWII, the new Camp Gordon in Augusta, Georgia found itself in a similar position as that of the original Camp Gordon in Chamblee, Georgia after the Great War. Both achieved combat readiness by completed training soldiers for combat and had the mission of discharging soldiers from active duty. Around 86,000 were discharged after WWII. Following WWII, prisoners of war (POW)s were repatriated back to their nations.

In 1946, Camp Gordon received a new mission to create a disciplinary barracks that housed American servicemen who had committed felonies during the war. Then, within a few months in 1948, the 545th MP School was transferred from Carlisle Barracks, PA to Camp Gordon and a signal school was established in Camp Gordon, relieving the burden on Ft. Monmouth, New Jersey.

The signal school would soon become the USASESS or Southeastern Signal School.

This, along with a civilian affairs school gave credence to the future existence of the WW2 temporary camp near Augusta. Camp Gordon had a future established.

This past year the pandemic imposed tragic cost to our nation, communities and fellow citizens. We can never forget those lost as we honor their lives by remembering their service to the nation and supporting their loved ones who remain behind. New vaccines and treatments provide us hope that we can once again gather and meet as we work to inspire the next generation of Americans to service.

The society had a strong first year successfully forming a non-profit, all volunteer 501.3(c) organization of 30 people representing over 750 years of collective service to the nation. These amazing servant leaders are dedicated to preserving Fort Gordon's military museum and retaining the historical items and artifacts in Augusta, Georgia. I want to thank each of you who have already contributed for your trust and confidence you have placed in this dedicated team. For those who have not contributed we invite you to join us and help raise the money needed to build this museum and inspire the next generation of Americans to serve.

A museum near Fort Gordon is important because for over 100 years men and women have come together to serve the nation and our local communities. Without a new museum home, we risk losing access to these artifacts, inspiring innovations and stories. With the museum at Fort Gordon now closed, our goal to preserve these substantial historical contributions will ensure the next generation of Americans are educated and equipped for service. With the publishing of this second quarterly magazine, we are well on our way to establishing a key cultural site and a state-of-the-art museum with live and virtual exhibits designed to inspire and educate the next generation of leaders.

This quarter we honor on the Military Police (MPs) who secure(d) our posts and who called Fort Gordon home for many years after World War II. My father was among those who trained here at Fort Gordon and through his stories I first learned about that dusty two lane road called Tobacco road and the unique unit of infantrymen who were trained here to also become MPs. Stories of service and sacrifice are throughout this edition.

Enjoy!

Dear Teammate,

On behalf of the Fort Gordon Historical Museum Society (FGHMS), I am writing to ask for your help to inspire the next generation to service across the nation.

The FGHMS is a 501(c)3 organization comprised of volunteers dedicated to preserving the history of Americans who served at Fort Gordon, in the Signal Regiment and the Army's Cyber Corps. Due to base growth and construction requirements, the current Fort Gordon Museum closed on 25 February 2021.

Preserving this important history for the nation is essential to training present day soldiers, educating the public and preparing young Americans for service across our communities in the twenty-first century.

Fort Gordon's collection contains a rich and extensive history that highlights substantial contributions of the many selfless servants. Their stories are inspiring and have moved many to follow in their footsteps and serve during difficult, dangerous and uncertain times.

The contributions of Soldiers such as Alvin York, Darryl Zanuck, Frank Capra and Theodor Geisel have not only ensured our Army's success they inspired generations to solve complex problems and overcome uncertainty by faithfully serving something bigger than themselves.

We now need you to help us save these stories to inspire the next generation. Please make a donation at <http://www.secureourstory.org>. We hope you will join us in this endeavor as no contribution is too small. Your contributions will help us secure the future home of the museum and continue to tell these stories and inspire many to service.

If you have any questions, please don't hesitate to reach out to me at cob@fghms.com or our Executive Director, Ms. Amy Tuschen at execdirector@fghms.com. We look forward to teaming with you as we honor all those who served and continue to serve the nation.

Sincerely,

Welton Chase, Jr.

Celebrating Presidents Day and Black History month

Written by Welton Chase

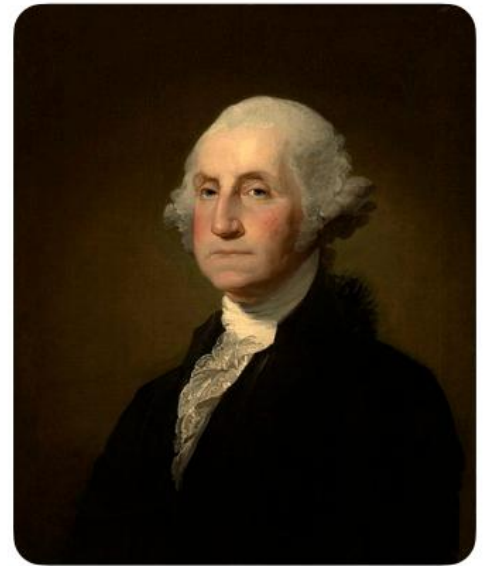

Each February we celebrate Presidents Day and Black History month. President's Day was originally established in 1885 to celebrate President George Washington's Birthday (15 February) after his death. Presidents Day is an important day dedicated to celebrating all U.S. presidents, past and present. Black history month gives us an opportunity to reflect on all those African Americans who have contributed to the history of our country. Carter Woodson, a historian once said: "We should emphasize not Negro History, but the Negro in history. What we need is not a history of selected races or nations, but the history of the world void of national bias, race, hate and religious prejudice." During February we reflect on the best of our Presidents along with those African Americans whose contributions of service to the nation we admire.

General Washington led our Army and the nation during difficult times at the founding of the nation and our Army. Although many things have occurred since 1775 when the Army was established some things have remained the same. The world was a dangerous place in 1775 when the continental army embarked on campaigns designed to earn our independence and today the world remains a dangerous place as we face new threats both at home and abroad. Then, as now, our nation called upon its sons and daughters to protect the homeland. Then as now, we need strong men and women who put the nation's interest above self-interest; who put patriotism above profit; and who are willing to serve and defend our country no matter what the cost.

While the accomplishments of our past presidents are well documented in libraries and history books, in honor of black history month I want to tell you a story of an African American who served the nation faithfully named Maurice Johnson. Now Maurice was a typical young man who grew up in the state of Pennsylvania and like many young men he struggled with what he was going to do after high school.

He was raised by a single mom after his father had passed away and she, like most moms, feared that he did not have a plan for his life. With prospects for work low and the probability for getting into trouble high, his mom was worried that his gifts would be wasted. In small towns dark influences have a way of finding young men and Maurice had a choice to make. Maurice's mom challenged him to do something big with his life; and he did. Maurice made a fateful choice to enlist in the United States Army and became a signal support systems specialist. I first met Maurice in 2003 in Mosul, Iraq.

I had just taken command of a battalion in the 101st Airborne Division (Air Assault) and Maurice was assigned to a very important mission. He was assigned with a small group of soldiers assigned as liaisons for the Division Commander and charged to provide communications support to newly elected mayor of Mosul. This assignment was an important job that would place him and his team at high risk. One day shortly after the city of Mosul elections, Sadaam loyalist who did not like the new policies of the mayor, assembled at his office to protest. As they protest grew, they became more violent. When these crowds threatened to storm the building Maurice and his fellow soldiers called for reinforcements to protect the mayors office.

Knowing that the rapid reaction force would take some time to arrive Maurice along with a handful of fellow soldiers grabbed their rifles and moved outside to bravely confront the crowd until help arrived. Through their quick and courageous actions the crowd was eventually dispersed. The newly elected

Disciplinary Barracks

Disciplinary Barracks for Convicted Criminals

Beginning in 1870, state correction facility punishments included the use of ball and chain, flogging, shackling, tattooing or branding, solitary confinement and execution. In early 1871, the Army banned all punishments except solitary confinement and execution. This became an issue as the War Department had very little say in these state run facilities.

Brigadier General Thomas F. Barr submitted a request to consider the concept of a military prison. Directed to investigate the situation by the Secretary of War, a board of officers was sent to Canada to study the British military prison system and their modes of punishment.

After thoroughly examining the British system, the board's recommendations for a military penal system were approved at all levels and a bill submitted to Congress in January of 1872. After a proposed location change to Rock Island Arsenal, Illinois, for the first prison, the bill was passed and was signed by the president on March 3, 1873.

For numerous reason, including excessive security measures being required, the Secretary of War and the Ordnance Department objected to the location. Through the Adjutant General, a board was created to consider, by examination of best established state penitentiaries and prisons, the best correctional programs and physical plans. The board did determine it would be better to use a different site and recommended, although they were not charged with the responsibility, several alternatives.

"If you want total security, go to prison. There you're fed, clothed, given medical care and so on. The only thing lacking is freedom."

-Dwight D. Eisenhower

The board's findings were presented to Congress by the Secretary of War in early 1874. The amendment was approved on May 21, 1874, and the all provisions set for Rock Island were instead transferred to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. In addition, existing buildings on site were to be modified as necessary to facilitate immediate establishment of the prison.

Remodeling, as well as building a wooden-fenced perimeter (stockade), was eventually deemed livable and the first prisoners arrived in September of 1875. Modifications were ongoing, including a stone quarry, which was used to replace the wooden wall with stone.

Vocational training began in 1877. Today it includes education, vocations ranging from stocking and clerical to varying repair training and job placement assistance for those whose sentences are ending.

Photographing of prisoners for the purpose of identification was set up by the War Department in 1888-89 to establish permanent photographic records.

In May 1941 it was announced that the blue denim fatigue uniform would be phased out and replaced with an olive drab, herringbone cotton twill (HBT) uniform. The new uniform was single breasted with five black metal tack buttons in front, plus a waist band with two additional buttons. The jacket also had a notched lapel with a fall collar, and two patch-type breast pockets with a split pleat in the center and a flap secured by a single metal tack button.

Fort Leavenworth was among the first prisons to use this positive means of identification.

The prison came under fire, for many of the same reasons it was created in the first place. A bill, introduced to the House of Representatives in 1894-95 ended the War Department's control of the prison and passed it on to the Department of Justice, becoming a United States Penitentiary on July 1, 1985.

The War Department was having second thoughts about the transfer of the military prison to the Department of Justice, as this transfer did not alleviate any of the original issues. On February 1, 1906 Fort Leavenworth again came under the control of the Department of War Department. It was later leased out to the Department of Justice due to overcrowding, but returned to the War Department on November 16, 1940.

With crowded conditions and lengthy prisoner waiting lists, the Disciplinary Barracks began to branch out in 1907. Some remained open only a short time, while others remain open today as state or federal prisons. In the meantime, Fort Leavenworth underwent reconstruction.

During World War II, with the exception of those facing life or very long sentences, soldiers who were overseas were held there as it was deemed unfair to return criminals to the safety of U.S. soil while honorable soldiers remained far from home. Had this policy not been in place, the Disciplinary Barracks would have burst at their seams.

Today, of the branches, only Fort Leavenworth remains a United States Disciplinary Barracks. And it is the only maximum security confinement facility of its type for the military.

were then sent to satellite labor camps to work on farms. Those who remained caned chairs or worked on road construction. Officers and the wealthy were never forced to work. Fort Oglethorpe was left largely with the German cultural and intellectual elite. This civilian group, while complaining frequently to the Swiss observers about their internment, found intellectual and creative stimulation in their associations with each other and produced remarkable performances ranging from a musical rendition of Beethoven's symphony Eroica to a dramatic production of Henrik Ibsen's play Ghosts. They also printed a newsletter, the profits from which were given to poorer prisoners, and they established a school in which courses ranging from Japanese to physiology were taught.

Though the war ended in 1918, many inmates in Georgia camps were not freed and deported until May 1919. Some 300 were detained at Fort Oglethorpe until April 1920.

World War II

During World War II prisoners of war were again interned in Georgia. By 1943 German, Austrian, and Italian POWs were held at Fort Oglethorpe, Fort Benning, Fort Gordon, Camp Stewart (later Fort Stewart), and Camp Wheeler near Macon. The Italians were usually housed separately from the Germans and Austrians. The larger camps were constructed to house 2,000-4,000 prisoners. POWs were treated according to the rules of the Geneva Convention, a circumstance that, according to numerous anecdotes, was surprising to them. They were supplied with adequate food, sleeping quarters, and medical care, and they were permitted camp canteen privileges and educational opportunities. They published newsletters and produced theatrical performances. They were also permitted to display national symbols of pride and to conduct funerals with military honors for the deceased. Prisoners not only maintained their camps but also performed such tasks as painting, mowing grass, and washing vehicles on the main installations.

As in World War I, installation camps had satellite camps of from 250 to 750 men that supplied workers for labor-poor southern industry and agriculture, and prisoners received half-rations and experienced activity restrictions if they refused to work. At one time before the War Department streamlined the camp system, Camp Gordon had satellite camps as far away as North Carolina and Florida. Workers harvested cotton, tomato, and peanut crops, and they worked in numerous industries, including pulpwood and lumber. By mid-1944 the shirts emblazoned with the large letters "PW" were a common sight in Georgia. Some German and Italian POWs befriended soldiers and farmers, and they were invited into Americans' homes for meals and entertainment.

Hard-line

Nazi groups in many camps led work stoppages and produced other tensions on a relatively steady basis. They maintained power over other German inmates through appeals to patriotism, intimidation, secret kangaroo trials, and murders of those whom they deemed suspicious. U.S. government officials attempted to identify those hard-line Nazis and intern them separately, but these efforts were less than successful. In 1944 prisoners at Camp Gordon secretly convicted a fellow inmate and strangled him because he was thought to have informed Americans about an impending work disruption and because he appreciated American jazz. His two murderers were tried and executed by the U.S. government in 1945.

With the war nearing an end, in 1944 the War Department began a reeducation program, which included photos and films of Nazi atrocities, to reorient inmates' thinking. Some prisoners also received lessons in reading English and in American history and government. When the war ended in 1945 all prisoners of war, with the exception of those serving sentences in U.S. penal institutions, were sent home. Some applied in their home countries to return to Georgia, and a few began to return during the 1950s, both to escape the devastation in Europe and to pursue employment opportunities.

leaders of Mosul along with those in that hostile crowd did not forget what those soldiers had done that day; none of us ever will. Their courage and action saved the mayor and his staff ensuring that peace and stability would endure. Evil did not win that day.

Just a few short days later on November 1st 2003 the leaders of that angry crowd would extract their revenge against the brave acts of these soldiers in the form of a roadside bomb attack that would kill Maurice and his Lieutenant (Lieutenant Josh Hurley). Although Maurice and his Lieutenant were killed that day their selfless service, courage and sacrifice would not be forgotten. During Maurice's memorial service I was approached by the Iraqi leaders of the Mayor's office. They asked if they could come forward to pray for Maurice and his family. I allowed them to do so and in a sign of great respect and courage they honored his service and sacrifice despite the great personal risks of doing this in front of their fellow countrymen.

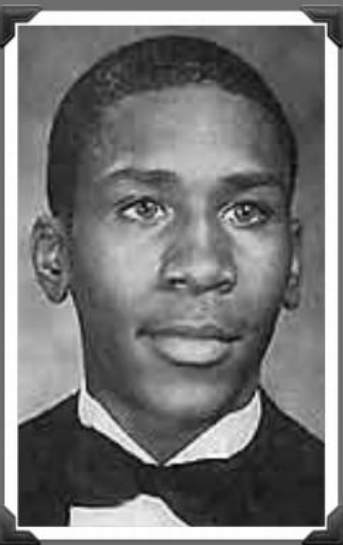

Maurice's mother had challenged him to make something of himself. When asked to stand up and serve, he did. When asked to go into harms way, he did. When asked to face danger to make a difference, he did. He did what great Americans most yearn all their lives to do: make a positive difference in this world. As we work to inspire the next generation to "service above self" we can never forget his story of selfless service and sacrifice. Maurice and Josh have woven a a bright strong thread of strength into the blanket of security that has kept our nation free. Their example continues to make a difference in this world by inspiring men and women to do the right thing even when they are afraid. Evil did not win on the day they were killed as their service and sacrifice will forever echo through eternity.

This month we celebrate for a multitude of reasons: the presidents who served us past and present, the contributions to our history by black Americans and also our loved ones near and far during Valentines Day. May we never forget all those who serve, and who even now are standing the watch around the world to keep us free. May their service remind us to hold our loved ones close and to have the courage to to make a positive difference every day.
